For the reader it is a chance to experience vicariously the adventures of sailing to parts unknown. Their first book, Under the Endless Sky, is also well worth reading. These two books are not your usually sailing to sunny tropical Islands kind of writing. They are wonderful travelogues, but also a chance to understand what compels two very interesting people pursue their dreams.

A man, a woman, and a sailboat, lost in infinitely faraway places. A journey along the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean on a quest to find unknown islands, people, and places. From shark hunters in Yemen to remote camps in the Sudanese desert and the dead city of Suakin. Then comes the island of Socotra which nobody knows and which once was a base for pirates; the Chagos atolls, the Maldives islands that are out of bounds for tourists; the perilous East African coastline, and the currents and cyclones of the Mozambique Channel. They're on a journey of discovery, following nothing but their instincts and their thirst for adventure, far beyond all known routes, searching for the last hidden corners of our planet.
