I had no idea about many of the incidents and accidents that can happen. The task of keeping an aircraft's logbooks safe and updated is often split among several different maintenance organizations and professionals, none of whom is ultimately impacted by the loss in value when the aircraft is sold. You know the old saying - "if everyone is in charge of something, then no one is in charge of it!" All this points to the necessity to take the same care with aircraft logbooks that we do with all of our other valuables and records - digitize it, back it up, keep it in a safe place, and keep it updated!

As an aircraft owner, you enjoy a very liberating sense of control. You control your logistics and your schedule. You may even hand-pick your travel companions and your flight crews. Most importantly, you control your time and your safety. That's exactly why it's important for you to control your aircraft records. This publication is intended to provide the basic information you need to make smart decisions that impact the safety and operational readiness of your aircraft, as well as its resale value. After spending a few minutes reading this brief guide, you will be able to confidently and intelligently make the best decisions for your circumstances in conjunction with your flight crew, your Director of Maintenance, and other service providers.
