By MJAF
I've read through several of the College Internship stories, and even have a daughter currently working the DCP, but this story was a bit different. This was the professional internship program. I figured this would be a good way to learn some of the differences between the books. In that regard, the book met most of those expectations. It describes well the differences and similarities between these two programs. That aside, the book's writing is pretty solid, much better editing than most of these books, and the story flows nicely. I'm rating it 4 stores, because while the story was good, it just didn't hold my attention. I kept putting it on hold to read other books, and then returning to it once those were done. Something I normally do not do with books of this type. So while the story is good, it just didn't capture my attention.

Nicely told tale of behind the scenes in the Animal Kingdom.

Lions and Tigers and Cast Members
Armed with a freshly minted degree in anthropology, Arielle Tuan found her job prospects less than hoped for. Then she heard of the professional internships at Disney's Animal Kingdom for college graduates interested in conservation. Apply? Why not! And from there her adventure began...Arielle soon found herself in possession of a "bug box" and told to educate guests about conservation and how they could help save the world whether they wanted to hear it or not. After the bug boxes, she moved to Wilderness Explorer Stations (then known as Kids Clubs) and "animal positions", including one that featured the seldom cooperative Marley the Crocodile.
For shy, introverted Arielle, her months in the steaming "jungle" of the Animal Kingdom, surrounded by wild animals and sometimes even wilder guests and cast members, brought about a metamorphosis.
From the girl with the bug box that most guests ignored as they raced for the "thrill" rides every morning, Arielle found her groove as one of the park's Conservation Education Presenters. Her stories shed light on a whole other world at Disney's Animal Kingdom. YOU'LL HAVE A WILD TIME!
